February is Black History Month

In reflecting Black History Month, I came across this story (Black History Month - Kindness of Strangers | Right at Home) of many touch points: the power of kindness, the power of education, and local context (Burlington County). My sharing is not connected to the business itself (I don't know the business). I'm sharing the story, among other reasons, because it illustrates how education is a catalyst for progress, individual and societal. It is painful to know, to read in the story, that educational opportunities have been denied to children based on race, or other characteristics. Education continues to be tremendously important to the history and progress of our country, as it becomes a more accepting, equitable, and just society that works to provide opportunities for children of all backgrounds. We strive to do so here in ETSD. Another theme that shines through in the story, which connects last week to this month to every day...the act of educating, of helping others learn, is kindness in action.
